locking slips of pager in their hands and anxious looks on their faces, eagerly counting the petrons of the troupe as they entered. Every now and then one of them would alip out to the teckst office, thrust his hand into the opening through which the tickers were dealt out, wave his alip of pager before the eyes of the man who occupied the responsible post of "treasurer" of the concern, and presently withdraw his hand, with two or three raged ahin-plasters grasped tightly in his fingers. Counting these, he would heave a lugarbous sigh, thrust the currency in his pootset, and return to his post at the door, to divide his attention between the performance and the straggling playgoers whe dropped in one at a time, and whose entrance fee was scarcely deposited in the hands of the "treasurer," when the previous operation would be repeated; a slip of pager would be thrust before his eyes, and the funds be transferred to the pocket of a hungry-looking collector.
